[19-20] Gold, a psychologist, believes that there are several reasons siblings don't turn to each other more for instrumental help. First, since they are usually about the same age, they may be equally needy or frail. Another reason is that many people consider their siblings safety nets who will save them after everything else has failed. A son or daughter will almost always be turned to first. It's more acceptable in many societies to look up or down the family ladder for help than sideways. Finally, siblings may not turn to each other for help because of (). They may believe that if they need to call on a brother or sister they are admitting that the other person is a success and "I am a failure." [23-25] The writers of the Constitution wanted to make sure that the people's rights would always be safe and () the central or federal government would never become too powerful. A government ought to have three major powers: to make laws, to carry out those laws, and to provide justice under law. ㉓ Should these three functions be in the hands of one person, there would be a great danger ㉔ that that person could use the power for personal profit rather than for the people. ㉕ To guard against this possibility, the Constitution established three branches of government: the legislature to make laws; the executive to carry out the laws; and the judiciary to watch over the rights of people as described in the Constitution. The powers of these three branches of the government are described carefully in the Constitution. The reason ㉖ for describing the powers of the three branches was to prevent any one branch () becoming stronger than the others. Each part of the government can only function in relation to the others. This system not only balances power between the three branches, but also ㉗ provide a check on each branch by the others. This system means that at all times the people's rights and interests are being carefully guarded.

[26-28] Q: You say that intelligence is much more malleable than most people believe. How can we get smarter?

A: Until about 20 years ago, most scientists thought that intelligence was mostly inherited, and that the environment's impact was limited. Important findings supporting this view came from studies of identical twins who were separated at birth. Even though they were adopted into different families, the twins usually showed very similar intelligence, which indicated that genes dominated. Now scientists think that those early studies underestimated the effect of the environment. First, adoptive families probably don't vary that much - they are generally supportive and emphasize success in school. Second, other data have shown that moving kids from low-quality to high-quality schools boosts IQ scores. The secret to getting smarter is really not a big secret: (). Read the newspaper, watch informative documentaries, and find and read well-written books. Just as exercise experts advise many small changes rather than a vigorous program, I think the best way to get smarter is to put a little more learning into every day. The trick is to develop the habit of looking for those opportunities.

- ② engage in intellectual activities
- ③ focus on what you can do well

- ⑤ develop good habits for exercise

- ① adversity ② influence ③ intention
- ④ tolerance ⑤ detention

28. According to the passage, which is NOT true?

- ① Early studies of identical twins adopted into different families showed the importance of genes.
- ② Reading newspapers and good books is helpful for enhancing our intelligence level.
- ③ Some studies report that placing children in different schools made differences in their intelligence level.
- ④ Getting smarter requires making a series of specific plans and implementing them one by one.
- ⑤ Exercise experts recommend people make many small changes instead of taking dramatic programs.

[29–31] Most visitors to Easter Island come specifically to see the 887 moai, enormous statues carved out of volcanic rock, ㉠ scattered around the island. Moai were regarded by the native people ㉡ as representations of their ancestors and powerful chiefs, living and dead. However, after a devastating civil war, only a fraction of them remain intact, and many lie half-buried in the ground. The question remains: with the average statue ㉢ weighing more than an elephant, () Writer Eric von Däniken claimed that the statues must have been built by aliens using materials from outer space. Unsurprisingly, historians are skeptical about this claim. It is more conceivable that the moai were simply dragged to their sites – an immense task, which accounts for many of them ㉣ being left at their quarry. Not all historians agree, however, and the riddle of the statues remains ㉤ unsolving.

[32–33] In the 18th century, legal expert Jeremy Bentham developed plans for a new type of prison. He called his prison a Panopticon, from the Greek word meaning “all-seeing.” It was designed with a central guard tower from which every prisoner could be observed 24 hours a day, seven days a week. At any given time, prisoners could never be sure if they were being watched or not, and therefore they would be less likely to break prison rules. Bentham said that the guards might even leave from time to time: the prisoners, thinking that they were still being watched, would continue their good behavior. Two centuries later, in 1949, a British author, George Orwell, in his classic novel 1984, wrote about a future society where it is impossible to evade () by the authorities. In the novel, citizens are constantly reminded of the authorities’ presence by the phrase “Big Brother is watching you.” In a sense, the world of () predicted by Bentham and Orwell has already happened. Public video systems are now in use in a great many cities around the world. In Paris, for example, there are road cameras nearly everywhere to help regulate traffic, and some 2,000 cameras on city buses detect and deter crime. In Britain, cities and towns installed cameras to monitor streets and parks, public transportation, stadiums, and shopping areas.
